

a) Social changes a woman may experience after having her first child in her early forties include; no longer having the freedom to go out to diner at any particular time, finding that all of her friend's children are grown and moved out of home, and that by the time that she is ready to work again, it will almost be time to retire.

b) The cultural and religious beliefs of individuals could greatly affect and influence their parenting and caring relationship.

Conflicts could quite possibly arise concerning matters of ethic and moral value. Compromises need to be made for a healthy parenting or caring environment to be achieved.

c) Parents responsibilities vary from ensuring a healthy and safe environment at home to educating about how to stay healthy and safe in environments away from home.

The above statement, taken from the Department of Community Services, shows the reader how the majority of parents, and carers, learn how to actually be parents and carers.

"Parenting styles may be different but we all share a common goal." That 'common goal' is to ensure that a child grows to respect and learn from other people, it is to be able to see a pleasing end result. A child who has grown into an adult only to find that the cycle will, hopefully, continue.