

Christianity and Islam have worked hard to show the world that the tension between them is diminishing. Islam has had its name tainted in the eyes of the public since September eleven and most of the conflicts are in fact cultural rather than religious. Recognised Islamic leaders such as Aziza Abdul-Halim who heads the Australian Muslim Women's Association has worked hard with interfaith dialogue to create better understanding of the Islamic faith, she did this by releasing her book on the internet so that it was easily accessible to the public.

Christianity has also made a contribution to interfaith dialogue with most churches being more accepting to other faiths. Various lunches, conferences and get togethers have been held in the name of interfaith dialogue.

These initiatives that have been taken to improve the relationships between religions show us that it can be done.
