

Question One

a) All these men, whom you see present here, think that a man ought to be defended against an injury concocted against him by unrivalled wickedness, but owing to the sad state of the times, they dare not defend him. So it is that they are present here today, because they are following their official duty, but remain silent for the reason that they are avoiding danger. What then? Am I the boldest of them all? By no means. Am I so much eager to carry out my official duty than the rest? I am not so eager for even that praise as to wish others to be deprived of it.
